BUTTER MAKING.

The editor of the New England Farmer, gives his method of making butter and his arrangements for milk setting at "Pine Hedge Farm."

We must allow that a good, clean, airy cellar may be the best place for setting milk in very hot weather on many farms, but there is no doubt that an upper and drier room would be better, provided the temperature could be sufficiently controlled to keep the milk sweet from eighteen to twenty-four hours, and provided also that dry, shallow setting is practiced. Dampness gives us thin, watery cream that runs through the skimmer almost as readily as clear milk. Finding a cellar too wasteful of cream, we built a milk-room wholly above ground, which has been used continuously from May to October, for the past ten years or more. It is protected on the east and west by connecting buildings, on the south by a broad covered piazza enclosed by blinds and still further shielded from the sun's rays by growing vines and shade trees. The room is about ten feet square, has a north window protected by blinds, the sash being generally removed in hot weather, a south window and a south door opening on to the piazza. These are left wide open through the night and kept closed by day.

On two sides are racks for setting common pressed, seamless tin pans, each holding about five quarts, when nearly full, the milk being about two and a half inches deep. On the north side is a long, wide shelf or table for setting the pans for skimming. The racks come down to within a foot and a half of the floor, and extend one above the other as high as is convenient for handling the pans when filled. No difference is observable in the keeping of the milk, whether set on the lowest or highest bars of the milk rack, but it does keep best on the side which gets the best circulation of air, when the door and windows are left open. The door and windows reaching to near the very highest part of the room give much better facilities for changing the air, driving out warm and letting in cooler air, than if the upper sashes were left in. Warm air, as we all know, rises, and if we have a body of warm air in the upper part of a room, it is not easily displaced except by an opening near the top. After the evening's milk is strained and set in its place on the racks, the door and windows are opened wide that the warm dry air may be driven out, and the cool evening air let in to take its place, and reduce the temperature of the milk as rapidly as practicable.

After straining and setting in the morning's milk, having allowed an hour or more for the animal heat to pass off into the cool morning air which has been flowing through the room, the door and south windows are closed, tight, the blinds of the north window closed, but the sash still left open. The room is then kept shut as much as practicable till evening, that the cool air of the night and morning may remain in the room as long as possible. With these arrangements for keeping out sunshine, and for keeping cool night air for a long time unchanged in the room, the difference between the temperature outside and inside the walls of the room, is often from twenty to thirty or more degrees.

There are a few nights during every summer when the air is but little cooled through the night. Some years the number is less than a half dozen, in other years more, but the time is very short when milk set in such a room as we have described will not keep sweet from twelve to twenty-four hours, while in such extreme weather the cream rises very rapidly during the first twelve hours after it is set.

It is claimed that damp curtains hung over milk room windows, by the evaporation of the water, cause a lower temperature of the room, and a few experiments have occasionally been made in that direction, but without any very marked effect. There are a few days during the summer when more butter could be made if the milk could be kept at a lower temperature, but it is very seldom that frequent watching will not save in good condition all the cream which the milk throws up. The one great danger to be avoided in the keeping of milk in the open air in warm weather is that of wheying off previous to removing the cream.

If, when a pan is taken down to be skimmed, there is found within layer of whey under the cream, and under that thick sour milk, the hope of making good, sweet butter from that cream may as well be given up, for it is next to an impossibility. If such cream could be churned immediately, and under the very best conditions, it is possible to make a fair quality of butter for immediate use, but as a rule, such cream had best be kept out of the cream jar. Cream taken from sour milk which has progressed in fermentation so far as to separate its whey will almost invariably give a strong, cheesy flavor to the butter made from it. Good cheese is good in its place, but most persons prefer to have their butter and cheese in separate packages, and dairymen should not forget this fact.

We should also remember that it is the milk of cream which sours and ferments. Fermentation goes on very slowly where but little milk is mixed with cream, but rapidly in warm weather, where a little cream is mixed with much milk, because the souring is mostly confined to the cheesy portions. For this reason cream should be skimmed just as soon after it is risen as practicable, that it may be kept as free from the effects of cheesy fermentation as possible. If good butter, or much butter is any object with the dairyman, he will see that the cream is skimmed before the milk wheys off. Simple souring does no harm, for just as good butter can be made from sour cream as from sweet, but it must be simply sour—nothing more. If we were to commence anew, we might adopt some one of the improved methods now before the public for setting milk in summer, but our room, as now arranged and managed, was built before much was known of the new methods, and, as good butter is made by this old method, and in pretty satisfactory quantities too, we have not, as yet, felt a great necessity for making a change. We do not believe that anyone system perfected is applicable to all places. Deep setting means water, cold setting means cold water or ice, or both, and it is not equally convenient for every one to provide himself with either in abundance. Each must select that method which to him seems best adapted to his own peculiar circumstances or surroundings.—Cor. Mass. Ploughman.

Kennebec.

Doubtless but few people are aware that Manchester is the home of several wild deer, but such is the fact. On Friday last Mr. John Wing discovered one of these graceful creatures feeding in his mowing field, less than half a mile from the Forks.

Piscataquis.

The Observer says: We should judge that the freight business on the B. & P. R. R. was rapidly increasing. Friday evening eleven freight cars passed over the road to Blanchard.

The Committee chosen to make arrangements for a Fourth of July celebration at Dover, report that the matter at present is undecided. If there is a celebration at all, the fact will be announced by posters or otherwise during the present week.

If Douglass & Co. of Guilford, are now having their drive of cedar sawed out, cutting from ten to twelve thousand per day. Shingles are getting very low as other kinds of lumber are.

The Universalist society of Guilford, have engaged the Rev. Mr. Case for another year. He began his labors last Sabbath; he is an able preacher and admired much by his people.

Somerset.

Sam Jacobs' horse "Wanderer," trotted a full mile in 2.38½ last Saturday over the Skowhegan track.

A maiden lady residing in the south part of Skowhegan, on her eightieth birthday, which occurred last week, walked three miles to visit a friend. Saturday she attended church conference, and on Sunday attended meeting for worship five times, taking part in all of the exercises that were of a social character, and on Monday morning was out shoppering, showing no signs of fatigue.

A fire broke out about half past three, last Friday morning, in the barn of Elbridge Varney, two miles below Skowhegan. The fire made such headway it was impossible to save scarcely anything; the house and barn are a total loss; part of the furniture was saved. The buildings were insured for $1800 in the agency of Chandler Tuttle. There is no doubt but that the fire was caused by some tramp who went there to sleep. A neighbor says "It's a great pity that he was not also consumed with the building."

Waldo.

Frank Wilder, of Belfast, while going west according to the injunction of Horace Greeley, was robbed at Chicago of his pocket book, money and railroad ticket.

Benj. T. Black, living at Belfast, lost a young steer not looking. The animal's mouth could not be forced open, and he was ill'ed to prevent death from starvation.

Benjamin Pooler, a prisoner confined in the Belfast jail or house bridge in Montville attempted to break jail one day last week. The monkey had taken his dinner to his cell which he supposed was locked, and had gone up stairs to the debtor's room. Pooler thought that he might escape by the middle door, but the jailer had set on the pittation to lock it. John took him back to the cell and administered some advice which Ben will do well to heed.

Ruth Wentworth, of Waldo, widow of Benjamin Wentworth, a soldier of the war of 1812, was in Belfast last week, looking after her pension claim. She is a smart lady eighty years of age, and a fair representative of those old-fashioned mothers who reared their children by the dozen. She said that she was the mother of seven children, fourteen of whom are living. She has fifty-five living grand-children.

The dwelling house of Horace Park, on the Belmont road, three miles from Belfast, was totally destroyed by fire on Monday noon. By hard work the two barns and furniture in the lower part of the house were saved. The fire is supposed to have originated from a defective chimney. Loss $4,000; insured.

Last Friday a man giving the name of Fred W. Small, of Connecticut, hired of the Belfast livery company a horse and buggy to go to Lincolnville and return, and ran away with the team. On Saturday, Dana Southworth, one of the company, started in pursuit and drove to Rockland. The next day he went to Thomaston, and there struck the trail of the runaway and procured a horse which he had sold. The trail was followed through the several towns to Waldoboro', where it was found that Small had stopped all night, registering his name as Harriman, from Pittston. At this place he traded the buggy for a wagon, obtaining $12.50 for the difference. He then drove to Round Pond, Bremen and Muscongus, at which latter place he was captured by Mr. Southworth and brought back to Belfast. On Tuesday Small was arraigned before the municipal court, and pleaded guilty to a breach of trust, but not guilty to stealing a horse. His trial was continued till to-day.

Frank Burkett's yacht that has been one year and a half in building is completed, and on Tuesday was hauled in and put into the water at Condon's beach, at Belfast. The yacht was built on Burkett's farm, one mile from Belfast, and was hauled in on trucks—four horses and three yoke of oxen furnishing the motive power. Her dimensions are thirty-two feet in length, eleven feet beam and six feet deep, and will measure at least twenty tons. She is well built and finished, has a good cabin, and will accommodate a party of fifty persons. All the lumber used in her frame was cut on the farm, and she is worth probably $1500.

FORTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.—Second Session.

Senate.

The President laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Senate, announcing that he had been summoned before the Potter Committee to produce the Louisiana election returns, and objected. In conclusion he requests instructions as to his duty in such cases.

Mr. Edmunds submitted an order that the Secretary of the Senate and heads of the departments furnish with the papers described, and submit said papers to the examination of the said committee, from time to time, according to his convenience.

A lengthy discussion ensued, several Senators claiming that the proper way would be to refer to the House to have requested the Senate to furnish the papers. Other Senators argued that the papers were not in the custody of the Senate by any law; they were merely in the possession of the Secretary accordingly to usage.

Finally the order of Mr. Edmunds was modified to reserve all questions touching the responsibility of the action of the House Committee; a call for the papers, instructing the Secretary to attend, etc., and as modified it was agreed to.

Mr. Bayard introduced a bill to amend the Revised Statutes so as to allow a change of destination of vessels and cargo. Referred to Committee on Commerce.

The Senate resumed consideration of the army appropriation bill. Mr. Blaine in charge of the bill said that the Committee on Appropriations had come to the conclusion that it would not be wise to unite the Indian question with the reorganization of the army under the same commission. He submitted an amendment to provide for the appointment of three Masters and four Supernumeraries as a joint commission to inquire into the expediency of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department and report the first of January. A debate followed.

Pending discussion on the amendment in regard to the transfer of the Indian Bureau the Senate took a recess for two hours, to enable Senators to attend the funeral of McDonald, late chief Clerk of the Senate.

Upon re-assembling at 9.30, the amendment reported by Mr. Blaine this forenoon providing for a commission to consider the expediency of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department was agreed to.

House.

The general deficiency bill was taken up, several amendments were offered and agreed to, none of them made a great deal of confusion.

The House at 5 o'clock took a recess until 7.40 in the evening, which session was the scene of so much uproar and confusion that nothing was done.

VERMONT.

Reconsideration.

BENNINGTON, June 7. An attempt was made last night to burn the Stark House and other buildings. After robbing a peddler's cart of some $300 worth of goods, it was filled with combustibles, fired and placed in a barn adjoining these buildings. Fortunately the fire went out and a disaster was averted.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Heavy Frost.

BOSTON, June 7. Reports from various sections of New England state that there were heavy frosts last night, doing much injury to vegetation.

WASHINGTON.

Approved.

WASHINGTON, June 7. The President has approved the joint resolution providing for the issue of arms to the territories.

American and French Commerce.

The National American Committee organized to aid in securing the Franco-American treaty of commerce, have adopted an answer to the President of the committee, organized at Paris for the purpose of organizing a popular movement in behalf of that object. The American committee say that we are prepared to cordially co-operate in directing the patriotic enthusiasm of France and the United States to great advantage, which must accrue equally to each country by such an adjustment of import duties, through a conventional tariff, as will increase its trade and develop its resources.

NEW JERSEY.

Returns.

BELVIDERE, June 7. Warren county recently elected a reform board which ordered a review of last year's county expenditures, showing that a ring had been raising vouchers, paying its members bills and stealing outright. It is believed that the county has been plundered of $250,000. A number of arrests will be made. Some of the parties have fled.

COURT-MARTIAL IN SESSION.

IN SECRET SESSION.

WASHINGTON, June 7. The Potter Investigating Committee met at 11.30 and immediately went into secret session. The committee entered the doors and took a recess until 2.15 P. M. The whole session was devoted to the arrangement of documents. At reassembling they again went into a secret session and at 3.30 P. M., the doors were still closed. It is understood that Judge Levisee will be recalled during the afternoon.

The Secret Session.

WASHINGTON, June 7.—The Potter Investigating Committee was late in throwing open the doors to-day; although members were in attendance at the usual hour. The time intervening between that and 3 o'clock was spent in secret session, and it was understood the business in hand was a critical examination and comparison of the electoral returns from Louisiana.

A Call for Documents.

On motion of Foster a subpœna duces tecum was ordered to be issued to the appointment clerk of the Treasury Department for all the recommendations on file in that department for the appointment of Anderson's brother to a position in Baltimore and the Secretary of State was requested to furnish the committee with all the original communications written, printed, or telegraphic on file in his office, or that may be under his control, relating to coming from one or all the members of the Hon. Stanley Matthews, commissioner sent by the President to New Orleans in April 1877, together with certified copies of all the communications written, printed, or telegraphic delivered to such commission or any member thereof from the State Department, or from the President to and that passed through the State Department.

The Chairman then presented the communication from the President in reply to the preamble and resolution of the committee, also the correspondence called.

The Correspondence.

This correspondence consists of letters recommending Anderson's appointment as Consul at Milan Cairo, Belfast or any place of same importance, and signed by the Louisiana delegation in Congress, with indorsements on the envelope of Anderson's application, (accompanying them) by the President and Stanley Matthews in recommendation of the appointment of Anderson to some unhealthy locality or to a dangerous Indian post, by "John Burbridge," who says, "we consider him Andersen] a person who has just qualified to serve the country in the capacity in the next memory."

During the reading of this letter and its endorsement, the Republican members indulged in a laugh of satisfaction, and even the Chairman and the Democratic members smiled, as if in sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the anonymous correspondence.

There was also a letter to the President signed by J. A. Straight protesting against Anderson's appointment; one from the President to Evarts asking him to retain the commission which he (the President) had signed for James B. Anderson as consul at Cardiff, until the facts as to his character could be instituted, and a response to Anderson's request by the President signed by F. B. Cane of the Louisville, Ohio, Daily and Weekly Herald.

FLORIDA.

The Potter Sub-Committee.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., June 7.—The wires being down last night delayed the report The following is in addition to Allen's testimony in answer to Hunter.

Allen said that he knew it was his duty to cooperate with Cook when the latter was absent. He knew Driggers had decided to act with Cook, but thought his being in town was a sufficient presence. The reason he did not participate on the 7th was because he knew it would cause a great prejudice among the people there. Were Cook and Bergman made a canvass? I thought it was not treating the people right, and felt an interest in the Republican party and took every advantage I could for it. I did not think they made a fair canvass. I believed they would do what was right, but thought it would be illegal for Cook and the junior canvasser alone. I was asked to do nothing but cooperate in the canvass of the county. I was not asked to throw out any precincts.

At this point Silcock introduced a resolution asking that a summons for J. E. Bryant and J. W. Hodel be issued, requiring them to appear before the Potter Investigating Committee, the latter giving as a reason for their vote that the testimony of these parties would relate to a subject beyond the jurisdiction of the committee. Resolutions were also introduced by Silcock that seven hundred persons in Alachua and Baker counties be summoned; rejected by the State vote. William Green recalled by Mr. Hoge. Examination by Silcock: Was born in Baker county, November, 1870; was Justice of the Peace; received my commission Nov. 15th; it was brought to my house by Driggers; never made any application for it. He told me he wanted me to assist in making a canvas of the county election; was sworn by Driggers three days at Sanderson; was sworn by Driggers at Jacksonville; described the proceedings at the clerk's office substantially as given by others, and said he signed the paper, and Driggers said it was a return of the election; didn't read it; didn't know its contents; only knew what he said; never performed the duties of Justice of the Peace afterwards except to marry a couple in the county jail to-day; before the canvass; "We are beaten and must turn the tables;" "we would assist in the canvass, we could make things all right." If I had known that any precincts were thrown out in the return I signed, and thrown out wrongfully, I would not have signed it. I didn't know any were thrown out until two days after I had left. I have paid any fees in my commission as justice.

Silcock made a lengthy cross-examination, and the witness said that two months ago he swore to an affidavit at Darbyville drawn by Morton, and was paid two dollars for the time so assumed in going there. He didn't ask what the affidavit was for.

Green was re-called, and Spencer testified in relation to the letter of Driggers giving him instructions in regard to the canvass. Cross-examined: Was appointed Justice of the Peace by Governor Drew; was not a candidate; was not present at the election; was not a member of the Democratic executive committee; was not a member of the Democratic county committee; was not a member of the Democratic county committee; was not a member of the Democratic county

CHARLEY'S FIDDLE.

It is a small matter in what army, North or South, this drummer belonged! Young he was, his fair skin tanned by the grim old sun, his blue eyes shining out like very forget-me-nots, in the dull, dark surroundings. They said of him in camp, that he was a boy, and surely they greeted him, in their rough way, like a child. Sunburnt man called him "Charley," talked with him, spoke of the scenes far away, where those whom these sunburnt men loved more than anything else in the world lived; and Charley listened to them, and heard what was covered cold to older, less unsophisticated companions, for somehow his young face, and light, cheerful laugh appealed to these men, and made them confide in him. There was even a rumor that Sandy Green the tall, awkward widower from the frontier, had told Charley about his own young days, and made the boy's blue eyes brim over at some little touch of sentiment.

You may, perhaps, say that there is no time, no place for sentiment among big, brawny men, prepared for an experience in war. It was not! Around camp fires, in places at night, when the tramp, tramp, tramp of the sentry seems ghostly, full of dire warning, there are tales of love and sorrow and loss and hope remembered and told to listening ears, that hear these faintest whispers as greedily as they do the awful, death-delivering sound or soft whistle of the rifle-ball. Thus was Charley, the drummer boy, a cyclopedia of all the gentler thoughts of the soldiers about him.

Often in the dusk of evening, when the men were loitering about the camp, and the kindly stars were peeping faintly out above the white tents, there would come a little, wailing sound on the breeze, and the listeners would stop in their game at cards, or their wild talk, maybe, a little, and say, "That's Charley's fiddle!"

And did any one take the trouble to look for the boy, he might be perched up on a ledge of rock, or sitting flat on the ground, his chin pressed down, and his bow in his hand, scraping dolefully out of his shabby vio lin all the old, old tunes he remembered and some of the never ones made for the occasion, and even some silly, love-lorn ditty, which had come by a devious way and a fearful mischance into camp. So, here among the purple shadows, when the fire on the outpost shimmered, and there was a strange quiet around, while the little crickets chirped, Charley would play the tunes of peace and happiness, the sad ones, dying away they were being played and sung by laughing, careless people in the crowded cities, filled with rumors of war, not understood, but appreciated.

But Charley had never been in an engagement as yet, and the men said, 'Don't be so anxious, boy; it'll all come soon enough!' And it did come soon enough for him!

Charley wrote to his aunt that camp life was just the thing for him, only it was so monotonous. He also told the boys that his aunt was the only relative he had in the world, and that she was a queer old woman, strong of will an l temper, and that she was "mortal angry with him" for going away from her for somebody or other, he guessed she "sort o' liked him." That was all he told them, and they got up a joke about "Aunt Teddy," and often spoke of her to Charley, and told him, when they saw him busy writing, to be sure to send much of their love to her.

"You don't know" or said Charley, "or you wouldn't make so light of it. Why she could take any of you single-handed and you'd never know what hurt you. And so he wrote often and often to her.

But Charley's fiddle! Well, it seemed a part of his life to the little fellow. He loved the plaintive little tunes; he could play on it, he loved to sit down anywhere, and at any time, and strike up one of those little tunes and play and play and play, till it was a wonder how much endurance humanity has, not to mention human fingers and patience. He would put his fiddle almost as though it were a child, and his blue eyes would flash as his hands swept over the strings. And the time went on; and in the intervals of Charley's drum-taps, his fiddle took it up.

The day came when there were preparations for a battle got up on; the enemy was surrounding them; and Charley was glad! but quiet.

There was less time for fun in camp now, and picket duty was, not sentimental any more, except that it was tragic. Two men had been picked off by scouts, and the pale faces of the boys looked like death, when they heard.

It was a fine pleasant, cool night, while the long white streets of the camp glistened in the moonlight, and it was not yet time for the men to turn in, Charley was seen by Sandy Green busily writing a letter on his drum head.

"For Aunt Teddy, Charley?" asked Sandy Green. And she boy nodded and laughed.

Then the old man stood there a long time and watched him. He saw the pleasant, brown face, with the blue eyes bent over the writing—and he was a rough, a very rough man mind you; a tall, ungainly, red-haired backwoodsman, older than middle life, and he was to whom trouble was no account, because it must be surmounted. And yet he stood there in the early moonlight, watching the drummer boy writing a letter to an old woman.

Charley looked up when he had finished. "Ho, Sandy! you here yet?" said he. Then he folded the letter and directed it. "Sandy, I'll give it to you to see posted for me. Will you do it? You've got more chances than I have."

So Sandy took the letter, and said, as he turned to Charley:

"Do you know, boy, that we expect a scrimmage, to-morrow?"

Yes, Charley knew it, and he was glad. He got Sandy Green to tell him over again about the battles that had been fought before; he listened, and was bright and chirpy over the stories; and the old man warmed with his subject, watched the light in the boy's eyes, and ended by patting him on the back.

"You'll do!" he said. "And now give us a tune, for who knows—will give us a tune!"

So Charley brought his fiddle, and sat down on the side of the drum, and Sandy laid his sprawling length on the ground, his head on his hand. Then a tune, light and gay went forth, and Sandy nodded. And the tune went on and on, till the stars blinked and grew brighter; and all at once Sandy said:

"Say, Charley, give us the song you played last night."

There was a slight pause—and then quietly, plaintively, on the pleasant air, came the old tune of "Home, Sweet Home," softly and slowly played, filling the air around, and touching with kind fingers the hearts of his listeners. The boy's head drooped over the fiddle, and the bow, balanced on his drum, and Sandy Green's hand was pressed hard into his head. And the time went on and on, and the stars sparkled, the crickets chirped peacefully, when, all at once, a bugle sounded, a confused noise was borne to them—Sandy was on his feet, Charley was on his hand—and the enemy was upon them!

Who can tell of the dread surprise, of the terrible fight of that night, carried far into the beautiful morning, when innocent daisies were red and horrible to look at, and the leaves of trees were blackened and scorched by powder? Who can tell of the wild, smirched faces turned sightless up to the sky; the dead hands clutching the grass; the torn and soiled clothing pierced with a little new hole, whence his life had fluttered out? Long into the day it lasted, and there was no more bird's song heard.

The white streets of the camp were gone, and a confused mass of men, some wounded, and all bitter, were there instead. The fight had ended, the enemy had disappeared, and these men were victorious!

Throughout the fight they all remembered to have heard the drum. They remembered seeing your drummer boy, his lithe, boyish figure in the thickest of the fight—for there had been small order, he could not be otherwise. And some of them said he had been seen with a musket in his hand, loading and firing, brave and soldierly.

And now there was a silence—those were not rolls cram-taps, and somebody else sounded the roll-call, as these men stood up to answer to their names.

There were many gaps in the roll—many men who would answer to but one roll-call more; the mighty Roll of the Last.

And when Charley's name was called, there was no response, and many eyes turned to other eyes in mute inquiry. So on the roll went; and at last Sandy Green's name was called—no answer. Again it was called—and then—then Sandy Green's voice answered from far away, and they saw him coming, limping up the hill. Charley on his shoulder, white and still. The man cheered—yes, they did—they cheered! And Sandy stood in the midst of them, his leg wounded by a ball, and told how he had been found by Charley, when a bayonet was going to make an end of him; but that Charley had used his own bayonet to dreadful purpose, and Sandy had been saved.

But, strange to say, the boy had not seemed to recognize him. Sandy had taken him on his shoulder, for the boy had grown faint and white, had called his name; but a blank look was all the reply he received. Charley's mind had stopped. There he was, looking at the men, a smile on his face, but an unmeaning look in his blue eyes.

They looked at him, they shook him by the hand; but he said nothing—he recognized no one.

The surgeon came and shook his head. "Bright!" he said.

But Sandy Green cried: "It's a lie, begging your pardon! The boy wasn't frightened."
